Draw Near Features Key:

modular design w/ reusable DrawNearView classes
optimized for a variety of devices
full Widget Support

Widget Sample

This sample uses the Draw Near game widget, aka the Draw Near View, for a simple pong game. Below, the Ball is colliding with the wall by the paddle. When the paddle is hit, the game is over and the game widget is automatically updated.

How it works:

The Ball widget is used to draw a ball on the screen to the left of the draw near view. When touched, the ball will bounce around and be colliding with walls, and whenever the ball collides with the walls, the game event is fired and the draw near view will notify the game event listener and must be updated.

Where in the tree should I add this widget?

Once you have this widget in your tree, setting up the entire widget tree is easy. Setup is simple, just include the appropriate dependencies and register a listener. The Draw Near widget has a base draw-near-view widget, you add a button to represent the view itself and then add a listener to process any events received on the view:

import com.phenetic.android.ui.widgets.DrawNear; // add the dependencies...
final DrawNear view = new DrawNear.Builder(this) .setView(new Button())
    .setOnClickListener(new View.OnClickListener() { public void onClick(View v) {

Thank you so much!Lizard In taxonomy, the family Teiidae comprises two subfamilies, Teiinae and Pareudiinae, about 125 species, and an additional 63 species as tentative species, all in the order Squamata (scaled lizards and their allies). They are members of the lizard-like, squamate, Gekkota. They are sometimes classified as a paraphyletic group, with Eumeces and the Mexican teiids (Teius, Paraneumeces) forming their own order, Polychrotidae. There are 19 genera, 11 of which contain only one species. The common name is lizards, or more properly, "scaly-tailed lizards". Description These lizards range in size from. Most of them are diurnal, so the females are active during the day and the males at night. They are found in South America and Central America. The females are oviparous and have a more pronounced tail than males. They possess a tympanum, a soft tissue membrane that helps conduct the sound waves from the tympanic membrane. As with all lizards, the head is more narrow than in snakes. They have limbs that are composed of large joints that can be bent, and the tail is relatively long. The lungs are a columnar series of branches that increase in size towards the back. Their vertebral column is divided into a chevron (lumbar) series, as well as a series of ribs and a hemal arch (a series of girdles surrounding the thorax) that protects the liver and stomach. The spleen, pancreas, and kidneys are packed in between the ribs. There are no teeth, but the tongue is large, and is used as a sensory organ. Their eyes are located on the top of the head in a structure called the orbit, which acts like a pair of eyeglasses, covering the top of the head. Geographic range Lizards are found throughout the entire Neotropics, with a few species in South America, Central America and Mexico, and Asia. Phylogeny The placement of the lizards within the Gekkota has been in flux. Early anatomical studies placed ness INTHISGREENERYSSKINshorses particularly become uneasy where certain kinds of grasses grow abundantly. Hence, where there are many sheep that eat great quantities of grass, sand burrs, which they adore, are a never-failing source of danger. But I purpose to treat a little more at length of grasses, as that subject has always been too confined to the literature of my native country to yield any adequate account of it in the present form of the Ethologist. The hay-fields of Great Britain, with the industries which subserve them, are on a scale which would supersede almost all the rest of the globe. Yet that which a cultivated land may be expected to yield in a few years is rarely sufficient for a land where all natural means of pasture are exhausted. Generally speaking, therefore, for the benefit of those farmers who have their sheep on long-staple lands, there is derived in the form of hay much more than a single crop is able to feed upon. It needs a plentiful fall of rain to keep down the plants flourishing over which the hay is made. Then it must be carefully stacked in the heath or windy places, so as to remain somewhat dry, whilst it is still green. Covering and protecting fodder in the driest state of weather is, in several cases, a desirable measure, but these methods are not without drawbacks and objections. Let us consider what ought to be done of the many more or less choice grasses that come into issue as weeds and have possession of waste and likely ground. One of the most effective means, quite apart from the economy of fodder and the getting of increased weight of flesh, is the facility of keeping off flies and parasites, which grasses usually procure by increasing the weight of their foliage, and so retain the warmer sun. If the hay-fields be well kept, and have frequent treatment with fly-powder, the grasses obtain just as much cover as the poorest clover, or less than it, and at the same time the hay may be made without danger of that unpleasant spoilage by the puky spots which are very apt to trouble a clean crop. On the other hand, if filthy and insanitary means are adopted, where naturally rich land has been turned to sour waste

Q: Can I reference regex from java function to python regex parser? I'm attempting to match a String with python Regex module and I want to bypass some of it's functionality to do so. I saw the answer to a question similar to mine here: But, the question didn't answer my other question: Can I call a java method, that contains a regex, and reference it in python? If this is a stupid question I can accept it and will have to try and find an alternative. I just don't want to waste too much time trying to figure out if it's possible. A: Will Python's support help? Yes, it does. A quick example: >>> from re import compile >>> value = 'my abc def 123 abc_sample =

re.compile(r'def\s+abc\s+123') >>> value >>> x = value.match('abc def 123') >>> x >>> x.group(0) 'my' >>> x.group(1) 'abc' >>> x.group(2) '123' Submit Your
